Stating the Obvious

Last week, I was somewhat taken aback by a comment from one of the children when they saw me in my shorts as we were about to run cross-country.
She said, "Mr A, I didn't know you had legs!"
I suppose she had never seen me in anything but long trousers. However, it reminded me that sometimes things are so obvious that we never think to mention them.

Your child has an emotional tank (as do you) that requires regular filling. While we strive to contribute to this at school, the most valuable contribution comes from you - their parents and guardians. Words of love and encouragement from you are the true premium product.

Let us not forget to tell our children that they are special, loved, important to us, and valued for who they are rather than for what they do. They are cherished just as they are.
