Why do we need values?

Last week, one of the boarders asked me a question that took me somewhat by surprise. I had assumed that our work on school values had made this clear. However, upon reflection, I realised that although we have undertaken considerable work on our school values, we had not addressed the next step: What do we do with these values?

Our values guide us in making decisions; our actions are often rooted in the personal values we hold. If you wish to understand what your child's values are, observe their behaviour. As a school, we aim to help shape these values in our pupils, but unless they are reinforced at home, our efforts will be limited.

I encourage you to take the time to engage in a conversation with your children about your family's values. Not what you ideally want them to be at first, but what they currently are, based on behaviour.

Following this, a discussion on any changes that may be necessary, and how these can be achieved, would be highly beneficial. I am not suggesting that the school's values must align with your family's values, but it is important to understand what influences your child's decision-making process.
